

Modified Construction Techniques Attempted by Assistant William Hemphill in Illinois and Michigan Streets: A Specific Look Through the Irrespective Lens of Convention in the Project

Heini Noah

Abstract—This research paper presents a detailed exploration of the modified construction techniques implemented by assistant William Hemphill in Illinois and Michigan Streets. Through a specific analysis of this renovation project, this study sheds light on the unconventional approaches taken by Hemphill in a bid to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the construction process. By examining the project through the lens of convention, this paper seeks to critically evaluate the extent to which Hemphill's techniques challenge the traditional norms and practices of the construction industry. Drawing on a range of primary and secondary sources, including historical documents, construction records, and interviews with key stakeholders, this research provides a comprehensive overview of the modifications made to the construction techniques during the project. Ultimately, this paper argues that Hemphill's innovative methods not only succeeded in achieving their intended goals, but also offer valuable lessons for future construction projects seeking to improve their efficiency and effectiveness. Through this analysis, this study contributes to the ongoing debate around the role of convention in the construction industry, and highlights the importance of exploring unconventional techniques and approaches to drive progress and innovation in this critical field.
